

The Greutunge settled in Phrygia thought their time had come to act. This group was composed mainly of survivors of the ODOTHEUS group that had been defeated in 386.

From among their ranks a "Roman legion" was recruited; from this we might infer the existence of Mithraean - Ostrogothic cavalry units. The leader of the Greutunge's horsemen was the comes TRIBIGILD.

who had done a great service fighting the Huns in 398.

There were many disaffected Goths in Asia Minor. The Roman army was full of them, making it possible for TRIBIGILD to use their presence to his advantage whenever the Romans marched against him.

After another Roman Army changed sides GAIUS was charged with conducting the war against TRIBIGILD. The Roman observers saw in them the game of two traitors who avoided hurting each other. GAIUS rebelled to stay alive. In winter 399/400 Gaius dropped his disguise, joined the rebels in Asia minor and crossed the Bosphorus into Europe. When Tribigild was killed shortly thereafter while fighting in Thrace, Valerius marched to Constantinople and occupied the city. He did not understand life in the big city. He demanded that the Goths be given a Catholic church. Vigorous opposition from John Chrysostom. All of a sudden, imperial palace
